Majority of jurisdictions allow capital punishment on distinct cases particularly those encompassing murder, treason, and espionage. Various techniques have been used in different periods to impose the death penalty on those convicted of wrongdoings which are punishable through death. These methods include the use of poisonous gas, hanging, death before a firing squad, and electrocution as well as lethal injection among others. People who support capital punishment are convinced that it is essential in maintaining law and order while those against it hold that it is not an appropriate punishment and approach to maintaining law and order hence it should abolish. At this period, some techniques of imposing it were adopted which encompassed quartering, drawing, beheading, burning at stake, boiling, and hanging (Lynch, 2013). Nonetheless, during the ninetieth century, capital punishment reforms had been established which decreased the number of crimes punishable through death.

For instance, according to an article published the by Canes-Wrone, Clark and Kelly (2014), approximately, two-thirds of the globe states including virtually the whole of Europe Continent, have eliminated capital punishment. However, in the United States which adopted the death penalty from Britain, there are still existing debates on whether the U.S should end capital punishment or not.
