

Cat Dissection Lab Report

Purpose:

For this lab report, you will report on how your experience dissecting a cat has helped you to answer the question: "Does cat anatomy serve as a good model for understanding human anatomy?" You will use evidence/observations from your dissection activities as the data (results) for your report.

Directions for Writing Your Lab Report

Title:

You should have a cover page with the title of the investigation, your name, date, and class.

Each of the following sections should be labeled clearly on your lab report.

Introduction:

The introduction of your lab report should give your reader enough information to understand why you are writing this report - you want to convince your reader that this is an interesting topic and a clear picture of the question driving your investigation. You need to do some research to write your introduction - this is where scientists provide the context for their study by telling the reader what other people have already discovered. Be sure to cite references using proper APA format.

- Start your introduction with some big ideas! What is dissection? What is the study of "comparative anatomy"? What kinds of information can scientists learn from the study of "comparative anatomy"?
- And then provide some background information about the use of cats for comparative study: Is dissecting cats in anatomy class a common practice? Why would people even consider using a cat? What are the potential advantages?
- At the end of your introduction, you will state the purpose/question driving your investigation, AND you will make a claim about what you expected to find when you dissected the cat. Do you think that study of the cat's external features, digestive system, urogenital system, and cardiovascular system will serve as good models for understanding human anatomy?
