A manufacturing company has placed computers all around the manufacturing area to help machine operators to relax during their lunch break and check their e-mails or social media. The company is doing so in an attempt to stop the machine operators from being distracted by their phones during their work and all the dangers that come with being distracted in a manufacturing area.

All the computers are connected to both the intranet and the internet. This allows an internal news bulletin and all policies and procedures to be displayed easily. There are regular updates, for example on family events, updates of procedures, bonus-related information and news on the employee of the month.

In addition to involving employees by sharing company news with them, all procedures are on the intranet. Anything from safe work practice guidelines to social media guidelines can be found on the intranet.

To use the computer, no login is needed. All computers are configured to be accessible to anyone, with ease. A downside of this is a shared hard-drive, and the older
