Retired Lieutenant Colonel Andrew H. Biggs was born and raised just outside Raleigh, North Carolina. After completing the JROTC program at his high school, he enlisted in the United States Marine Corps and underwent basic training in Parris Island. Biggs distinguished himself during training and was presented the "Chesty" Puller Recruit Company Honor Graduate Award in his company.

Following basic training, Biggs was deployed to the Korean peninsula in 1980 to secure strategic locations in the fight against Communist Korean forces. While deployed, he was given command over a small regiment in the 105th Armored Infantry Unit as a special operative. Biggs' unit underwent 27 operations, and was able to successfully secure 15 key waypoints and open up key transit routes. Biggs' company was credited with 59 kills, with Biggs himself being credited with 23 of them. His contribution towards his mission led to him receiving commendations from his superiors, including a Bronze Cross for his bravery. After his 27th operation, Biggs was reassigned to the Special Rifle Division in the 33rd Ordinance, where he sent to Lungshang to combat opposing forces in the region's hot zones for two years. In that period, he was able to fulfill mission objectives tirelessly while repelling opposing forces. His dedication towards his mission led to his promotion to sergeant first class.

After his first deployment, Biggs signed on for two more tours in other parts of the Pacific theater. His superior organization of troops and resource management led to continued success in the Korean peninsula as well as with further inland progressions into the Soviet territory. By the end of his third tour, Biggs had been promoted to Lieutenant Colonel. He later served as an advisor to the Military Police branch of the United States Marine Corps. He now currently resides outside his hometown in Raleigh, and has a wife, three children, and seven grandchildren.
