Fakultah le-mad'e ha-mahshev,1973 Airline Reservations and Capacity Planning Emmanuel Missadji Akai,1986 Airline Reservations Forecasting Anthony Owen Lee,1990 In this thesis we develop the necessary statistical framework to produce accurate forecasts of total bookings in a particular fare class on a specific flight number departing on a given date at various points before departure After an introduction to the basic terminology of the airline booking process a rigorous probabilistic model is developed The booking process is modeled as a stochastic process with requests reservations and cancellations interspersed in the time before a flight departs The key result of the probabilistic analysis is a censored Poisson model of the airline booking process A comprehensive statistical framework views the booking process from a data analysis perspective We describe models based on advance bookings the traditional booking curve and historical bookings a traditional time series model An important development is the combined model which features a potentially more accurate combination of the advance bookings and historical bookings models Additionally we extend the statistical framework to include booking limits which constrain the observed number of reservations in each fare class The result is a truncated censored regression model with truncation from below at zero and censoring from above at the booking limit We test the forecasting ability of the censored Poisson model and a combined statistical model with censored Normal errors using actual airline data provided by a major U S airline When compared to industry standard models the models developed in this thesis produce significant improvements in forecast accuracy In the appendix a Monte Carlo simulation is performed to determine the value of accurate forecasting for the airlines The results demonstrate that each 10% improvement in forecast accuracy can bring about a 0.5% to 3.0% increase in expected revenues Airline Reservations and Automated Fares and Ticketing in SABRE Vocational Instruction and Software, Inc,2000 An Expert Database System for Flight Reservations Lakshman Babu Chinnakotla,1989
