Interpreting reality?

On the way there, I stopped at a renovated mansion that houses the Brussels-Europe Liaison Office where Tok Toc Knock was showing a 15-minute video by Flemish artist An van Dierden.

"Cherry Blossoms" is about a simultaneous interpreter working for the EU Parliament. In a room with an impressive mediaeval stone fireplace and scenes from mediaeval life carved by mediaeval artisans for their rich patrons, I could sit in a modernist leather armchair and consult the book that accompanies the post-modern video art.

"Cherry Blossoms" is not a documentary, nor is it entirely fiction. The point is where do we draw the line between the two? Is a documentary a genuine depiction of reality? Can we actually categorise films into genres or is compartmentalisation the way that our societies mediate our knowledge and make it convenient for consumption? That is a very good question.
