Sources: (1) Course materials developed by CDR Hewitt Hymas, USN
(2) Frenzel, Principles of Electronic Communication Systems, 3rd ed., McGraw Hill, 2008

- Name the two sources of light used in a fiber-optic communication system.
- Describe the basic operation of a fiber-optic communication system.
- Describe how a light source is modulated.
- Explain the benefits of using fiber optics.
- Explain how light is propagated through a fiber-optic cable.
- Name the three basic types of fiber-optic cables and state the two materials from which they are made.
- Calculate the transmission loss and maximum data rate of a fiber-optic communication system.

Why Optical Communications?

As mentioned in the lecture on Microwave Communications, the frequency spectrum used for radio communication is getting crowded. This has led to the use of optical communication systems, which use light as the carrier to transmit information from one place to another.

Light is a type of electromagnetic radiation like radio waves, but because the frequency of light is extremely high, it can accommodate very high data rates with excellent reliability.

Why is the data rate high with optical comms?

Recall that the main limitation of a communication system is its restricted information-carrying capability, and that the information-handling ability is directly proportional to the bandwidth of the channel by Hartley's Law:

$$C = 2B$$

Using light (think frequencies of  $10^{12}$  Hz!) vastly increases bandwidth

The transmission medium for optical communications is either free space or special cable called fiber-optic cable.

Optical Communications in Free Space

Sources of light used:

- Light Emitting Diodes (LED)
- Lasers, which can generate monochromatic (single frequency) light and produce a very narrow, intense light beam

These sources can follow signal changes as fast as 10 GHz.

The modulator shown above is used to vary the intensity of the light beam in accordance with the baseband signal.

- Amplitude modulation (intensity modulation) is when the information signal varies the brightness of the light beam
  - Analog signals vary the brightness over a specified range
- Digital signals turn the light beam on and off at the data rate (pulse modulation)
- Frequency modulation (FM) is not used. There is no practical way to vary the frequency of the light beam

The receiver is a photodetector which amplifies and demodulates the weak received signal.
