1 Factor Proportion Theory

- The law of comparative advantage establishes the relationship between relative autarky prices and trade flows
 - But where do relative autarky prices come from?
- Factor proportion theory emphasizes factor endowment differences
- Key elements:
 1. Countries differ in terms of factor abundance [i.e. relative factor supply]
 2. Goods differ in terms of factor intensity [i.e. relative factor demand]
- Interaction between 1 and 2 will determine differences in relative autarky prices, and in turn, the pattern of trade
- In order to shed light on factor endowments as a source of CA, we will assume that:
 1. Production functions are identical around the world
 2. Households have identical homothetic preferences around the world
- We will first focus on two special models:
 - Ricardo-Viner with 2 goods, 1 “mobile” factor (labor) and 2 “immobile” factors (sector-specific capital)
 - Heckscher-Ohlin with 2 goods and 2 “mobile” factors (labor and capital)
- The second model is often thought of as a long-run version of the first (Neary 1978)
 - In the case of Heckscher-Ohlin, what is the time horizon such that one can think of total capital as fixed in each country, though freely mobile across sectors?
