

Known-fate models

In previous chapters, we've spent a considerable amount of time modeling situations where the probability of encountering an individual is less than 1. However, there is at least one situation where we do not have to model detection probability: known-fate data, so-called because we know the fate of each marked animal with certainty. In other words, encounter probability is 1 if we're ever able to see them (the case of a marked individual with certainty). This situation typically arises when individuals are radio-collared, although certain kinds of data from capture-recapture (e.g., gillnet) can also be analyzed with the known-fate data type. In such cases, known-fate data are important because they provide a remedy for uncertainty of survival probability and other parameters.

The issue of known-fate animals is the combination of survival probability, ϕ , the probability of surviving, and capture probability, p , the probability of being sampled. There are models where it can be assumed that the sampling probability over t trials is the same (that is, survival of all tagged animals is known) or that sampling increases. For the former, probability is typically quite high, as proven in the historical distribution of known-fate capture-recapture sample sizes in other forms of research. The only disadvantages might be the cost of radio and genetic information that can be far more expensive to collect. The model is a product of capture historical likelihood. Estimating survival in these and other marked animal experiments such as bird-banding, have also been applied to known-fate data.

In fact, the known-fate data type resolves the capture-recapture regression or any statistical problem. The main advantage of using MARK for known-fate analysis is the convenience of model selection, and the capability to model average survival estimates easily and compare model-effectiveness.

16.1 The Kaplan-Meier Method

The standard scoring system for the analysis of known-fate data is the Kaplan-Meier (1958) estimator, which allows us to study time before encountering a given death or approach that will occur on the basis of the end of the design.

The Kaplan-Meier estimator is a nonparametric method for observed data on survival outcomes, where animals are marked and released with an estimate $\hat{\phi}$. The full measure of the survival function is where n_i is the number of animals observed at time i and d_i is the number of animals that die before the end of the interval i , in the known-fate data of observation i . And the product is over i up to

$$\hat{S}_n = \prod_{i=1}^n \left(\frac{n_i - d_i}{n_i} \right)$$
